Dear Sir or Madam,

It's no secret that taunting, ostracism and even harassment often target men who aren't seen as masculine enough or women who aren't seen as feminine enough. In fact, one-third of college and university students report being harassed or discriminated against on campus for not fitting expectations of masculinity or femininity – according to a recent survey sponsored by the Gender Public Advocacy Coalition.

That's a sobering statistic for any educator committed to providing safe campuses where all students can learn, grow and succeed. Yet the role of gender stereotypes in harassment that occurs on college campuses has historically been overlooked, leaving many students to fend for themselves: an effeminate man barred from a fraternity, a transgender student harassed for using the "wrong" restroom; or a female athlete teased for being too "masculine."

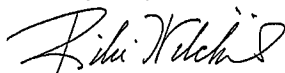

Just ten years ago, almost no institutions of higher education included "gender identity and expression" in its non-discrimination policy. Today, nearly 1.4 million students at 150 colleges and universities are protected by such policies – including three-fourths of the country's "Top 25" universities.

In addition to policy changes, colleges and universities are also making their practices more inclusive by increasing the availability of gender-neutral restrooms and providing gender-neutral housing options to students.

The GENIUS Index (Gender Equality National Index for Universities & Schools) tracks and evaluates progress to date in ensuring that campuses are GenderSAFE™ – supportive, protective and equitable for all students, whether or not they fit expectations for masculinity and femininity.

To attract the best and brightest, colleges and universities must ensure that their campuses are safe, welcoming and productive environments for all students. If you are interested in taking additional steps toward making Cornell College's campus inclusive, please don't hesitate to reach out to us for help at genius@gpac.org or 202.462.6610.

For Equality,

Riki Wilchins
Executive Director
